Review: Cuban Anarchism: The History of a Movement

[2] In Cuban Anarchism: the History of a Movement, Chapter 4, Fernández relates how the anarchists in Cuba decided to issue a Declaración de Principios (Declaration of Principles), in the summer of 1960, accusing the Castro regime of strengthening government centralization, and moving toward a Marxist dictatorship. The eight points of the Declaración also outlined the ways in which their anarchist perspective differed from the policies of the regime: "1) it defined, in accord with ...

Nineteenth-century Cuban society possessed a set of characteristics unique in the western hemisphere. From the beginning of the century, exploitation of Cuba's economic wealth had been the work of the white ruling class, who bore titles of Spanish nobility. This creole aris-

Cuban Anarchism: The History of A Movement

History of anarchism is as ambiguous term as anarchism. Scholars find it hard to define what anarchism is and thus what history of anarchism is. There is a spectrum of views on anarchism and its history, ranging from anarchism being a distinct well-defined movement of the 19th and 20th century while others identify anarchist traits long before first civilizations existed. Prehistoric society existed without formal hierarchies, close to anarchist principles. The first traces of anarchist thought
