Previous work has shown that the processing of aluminium alloys by selective laser melting (SLM) is difficult, with reasonable components only being produced with high laser powers (minimum 150 W) and slow laser scanning speeds. The high laser power is a significant problem as it is higher than that used in many SLM machines.

Employing "solid-state" mechanism can avoid polysulfides dissolution in lithium-sulfur batteries but lead to limited reactivity. It is desirable to eliminate polysulfides dissolution under "dissolution-deposition" mechanism but merely impossible with S 8 due to its intrinsic parasitic reaction pathway. However, sulfurized polyacrylonitrile (S@pPAN) is suggested to involve S 3-4 and ...
